Sascha Braunig's paintings pulsate with patterns so perfectly rendered they look digital, but they bear the oily, wet look of paint and the soft touch of a brush. Human forms emerge out of the pixelated color fields, turning each into deeply expressionistic surrealist portraits. "I can't quite differentiate my self from my world so I've got painstaking fantasies of where I begin and end," reads the press release, which has been penned as a letter from one of her beings introducing itself to its viewers.
